If you follow Sean Feucht (@seanfeucht), Proud Boys, or Patriot Prayer, you are following white Christian nationalism, a violent ideology incompatible with the teachings of Jesus, the Prince of Peace. Be a Greatest Commandment Christian. Love as radically as Jesus did. #DoJustice

The Growing Religious Fervor in the American Right: 'This Is a Jesus Movement'

This is @seanfeucht. He's a Christian singer who got 75 of his best friends together to camp out on a flatbed truck in front of Disney headquarters to protest "the sexualization of children". I think the bigger issue is that horrific comb over 😂 #disney #burbank #seanfeucht

Worshippers perform baptisms at The Coming King Sculpture Garden in Kerrville on October 4.

Fashioning himself a leader of a "new Jesus movement"—a reference to a Christian revival in the 1970s—Feucht began traveling the country. He staged a rally in New York at Washington Square Park, which featured baptisms in the park fountain. In August, after months of protests nationwide, he held gatherings in Portland and Seattle, intended, he said, to counteract the "narrative of burning and destruction" in the news.

One rally in Redding drew thousands of people, including some members of Bethel Church. Attendees were mostly maskless and packed together. Afterward, Bethel put out a statement making clear that Feucht did not represent the church, and conceding that a safety plan "did not get implemented to the level it needed to be at this gathering." Aaron Tesauro, the church spokesman, told me Bethel was not involved in the rally.

I saw a fearless church, I encountered a fearless people, you know, and I know people write about it and there's conferences about it, but there's nothing like actually watching and beholding a people that are unwilling to back down."

Americafest attendees listening to Feucht gobbled up his talk of victimhood as one of the key themes at the event was the fight against so-called "cancel culture" and the "liberal woke mob."
